Regulatory Stability Means Competition, Lower Prices, and Better Services for Consumers and Businesses

- Competitive carriers have enjoyed nearly two years of regulatory stability and have responded by investing billions of dollars in new facilities and services
- Recent AT&T/BellSouth merger conditions ensure stable regulatory environment through the end of the decade
 - Rate freeze for telco network elements used by competitive carriers until 2010
 - No forbearance petitions with the FCC during this time
 - In short, the largest incumbent phone company has agreed that no further tinkering with pro-competitive network access requirements is needed
- FCC has already deregulated new broadband facilities of telcos
 - Telcos now have full parity with cable company broadband services
- Further fine tuning of telecom regulation will only bring back uncertainty, new waves of litigation and stalled investment
- With deregulation of investment in new facilities, the only remaining regulations are minimal, pro-competitive network access requirements that allow carriers like Covad to utilize legacy copper loops that telcos built out many years ago
- Covad connects these legacy loops to its state of the art network to provide innovative new data, voice, and other services to businesses and consumers
 - Verizon Forbearance Petition would remove this important source of competition with no corresponding benefit
